US Treasury deputy sec warns unvaxxed Americans that shortages will continue until 2024: report

07:14 Wed, 06 Jul 2022 | Updated 07:14 Wed, 06 Jul 2022

Get short URL

The deputy secretary at the US Treasury has cut Americans on notice that the only way to end the plague of empty shelves and the crunch is for more people to get vaxxed. The bad news is that it will be a long time.

Wally Adeyemo, the Biden administration's second-highest official in the Treasury Department, appeared to publicly contradict the optimistic portion of Americans who had been saying that everything would be back to normal by Christmas. Adeyemo, speaking Wednesday, blamed the ongoing shortages of consumer goods that have led many to the president to the lowest approval rating in his tenure.

Adeyemo said, "I think what people are feeling is a lot of supply chain issues." Adeyemo said the supply chain issues are due to unvaxxed workers. Adeyemo claimed that the supply chain issues caused by many US workers are an international issue and will only let up when a sufficient percentage of the country has been vaccinated.

ALSO ON RT.COM

#EmptyShelvesJob trend dominates Twitter as shortages back up at ports and Biden administration blames... Trump?

Describing the disastrous economic conditions as "an economic storm in transition," Adeyemo acknowledged "we are in a difficult moment." He said that the economy is "growing at a very, very, very,